orders were reported on combed yarn goods. The movement was looked anon as important from the fact that some of the large printers and handlers of bleached goods were the active buyers, after having shown no interest in prices for some time.

No substantial improvement is yet reported in the movement of finished goods in first hands, and mills are increasing rather than decreasing curtailment operations. On the other hand, there have been active clearance sales of domestic and printed cottons in jobbing centers, the prices in many cases being lower than the last values placed on goods by mill agents. It is also goted that more low-priced retail sales are taking place in various sections of the country, notably so in those centers of industry where ithere is the sections of the country, notably so in those centers of industry where ithere is the sections of the country where ithere is the sections of the country where ithere is the sections of the country where ithere is the section of the country where ithered is the section of the country where ithered is the section of the country where it is a section of the country is

"The Young Visiters," as nearly every one knows, is supposed to have been written by Daisy Ashford at the age of nine, though at the time of its publication and since, there has been considerable speculation as to whether or not the real author may be Sir James M. Barrie, whose delightful prefaces furnished further ground for that opinion.
